WOMAN ON THE MOON

Jane wanted to be an astronaut. She had wanted to be an astronaut since she was a small baby, when she would point at the stars as if to say "take me up there". Most of all, she wanted to visit the moon. Jane was born in 1959, and so was ten years old when the first moon landing took place. The Apollo 11 mission was all that she would talk about for months. She looked up to Neil Armstrong and Buzz Aldrin as heroes, and she wanted to walk on the moon just like they did. She never forgot seeing Armstrong step out onto the moon for the first time, sat with her eyes glued to the television. It was the most amazing thing she had ever seen.

Jane wrote stories about going to the moon, drew pictures of the moon, even composed songs about going to the moon. Once, she made up a story about an astronaut called Mary Michaels who was the first woman to walk on the moon. She worked especially hard in science lessons at school; she wanted to understand how space travel worked. After all, if she was going to become an astronaut then she needed to know about that!

But in 1972, when Jane was thirteen years old, the Apollo 17 mission marked the last time that humans visited the moon. She was shocked and upset ─ she hadn't had the chance to go yet, no woman had. She wondered why they could possibly want to stop sending people to the moon. She didn't care then about how expensive the moon missions were, or how dangerous. She just couldn't understand.

Jane became an adult eventually, and gave up her dreams of walking on the moon. Working hard in science class paid off, though, and she now works as a research scientist at NASA (the American space programme). Sometimes, though, at night when she looks up into the sky and sees the moon, she still wishes that she could have walked on its surface.

1. What was the year of the first moon landing? (2%)
   The year of the first moon landing was 1969.

2. What do you think the phrase "eyes glued to the television" means? (2%)
   "Eyes glued to the television" means that she didn't look away from the television.

3. Who was Mary Michaels? (2%)
   Mary Michaels was a female astronaut in Jane's story.

4. Why was Jane devastated by the Apollo 17 mission? (2%)
   Jane was devastated because it was the last moon mission and she hadn't had the chance to walk on the moon yet.

5. How many women have walked on the moon? (2%)
   No women have walked on the moon.

6. What does "that" at the end of the second paragraph refer to? (2%)
   "That" refers to how space travel works.

7. When did Jane give up her dreams of walking on the moon? What did she do instead? (4%)
   Jane gave up her dreams of walking on the moon when she became an adult. She became a research scientist at NASA instead.
